

Post-Conviction Restoration Of Civil Rights

In most basic terms, it would seem that a sentence from a court, be it a prison term or probation, or both, is reflective of the punishment that one deserves for committing a crime.

Continuing to punish someone after they have served their sentence is a continuing punishment.

There appears to be no rationale for some one to be continually punished, even after the court imposed punishment has ended.

All persons having finished the term of their punishment should have their full civil rights restored.
